Content :	Part I of this course (20 hours taught by Guido Latré), deals with English-speaking Europe. A first chapter concentrates on the major political, social and cultural choices made by the British in the aftermath of World War II, taking as its starting-point the contrasting social models proposed by Churchill and Orwell (conservative policies and a hierarchic society, versus socialism and the welfare state). A second chapter deals with Ireland: its turbulent past, the independence of the South, and political developments in the North since 1968.  Part II (10 hours taught by Véronique Bragard) examines the United States's current political situation in relation to its migration history of newcomers, outsiders, and insiders. Dismantling the "melting pot" myth associated with the United States, this module explores the history, rights and political engagement of its mosaic of minority communities starting with among others the Native-American and followed by the Jewish, African-American, Asian and Mexican minorities.
