Content	This course offers students an opportunity to analyze the dominant literary and artistic productions and movements of the 19th & 20th century and their aftermath: from Victorian to modern, from modern to post- postmodern, post-9/11 and climate change fiction. This class first contextualizes Victorian times, modernity and the postmodern cultural phenomenon (Lyotard, Jameson, Hutcheon). It starts with a first module on gender and female voices. After an introduction to Victorian times and literature (with an in-depth analysis of Charlotte Brontë's Jane Eyre (1847)), it examines postcolonial fiction via an analysis of Jean Rhys's Wide Sargasso Sea , the famous prequel and response to Jane Eyre . The second module focuses on modernism and postmodernism exemplified by a comparison between Virginia Woolf's modernist novel Mrs Dalloway (1925) and Michael Cunningham's postmodern rewriting The Hours (1998). The third part of this class addresses the possibilities and limits of storytelling in graphic novels: war trauma in Art Spiegelman's Maus and climate change/human impact upon Earth in Richard McGuire's Here (2014). This last module provides students with an introduction to comics studies as well as to a number of critical terms (trauma, postmemory, deep time, hyperobject).
